VERTICAL DENSITY THE PUBLIC DIMENSION

JANUARY 21 & 22, 2010
HONG KONG

The Hong Kong - New York Urban Exchange Group, AIA Hong Kong, and The Skyscraper Museum present a conference convening government and city officials, architects, planners, and developers from Hong Kong, New York, and Shanghai on the comparative architecture, urbanism, and public space of their cities.

The extreme vertical density of Hong Kong and New York, together with newly expanding cities such as Shanghai, is driven by market forces and private investment and shaped by municipal regulation and planning.

How can the vital concentration and growth of successful cities be balanced with an enlargement of the public dimension and a celebration of urban space and life? How can the essential character and cultures of place be protected, and how can government and private interests combine to create and maintain this public dimension of the urban environment?
